

Abstract of the Disclosure

Under at least some operating circumstances, when a temporary session parameter (such as, for example, a temporarily assigned Internet protocol address or a negotiated point-to-point protocol session parameter) is used during a first Internet protocol session for a given node, and that node initiates a new (or what appears to be a new) session within a limited period of time, that temporary session parameter is again used to facilitate the new session.